Our great American naturalist, John Burroughs, fell in love with the woman who later became his wife when he was only eighteen years old as he relief tendencies are largely dealism, my romantic tendencies only eighteen years old, as he points out simply in his autobiography, the whole hermits side I find no fishermen or ourse of his life was altered as a result of this event.

The young woman who was so fortunate as to win this great man's love bore the picturesque name of Ursula North. She lived in a small town in New York State, not far from Burroughs' home. At the time of their first meeting Burroughs was a teacher in the school there, and in spite of his youth and natural timidity he managed to command the respect and even fear of his charges. John Burroughs did not wait long to be married, and was scarcely more than twenty when he took Ursula North to be his wife. She must have been a bride of unusually adaptable habits, for John Burroughs spent the next six or seven years of his life going about from one teaching position to another, spending the summer at his home farm where he work-ed like any farm laborer.
